Growth and Change

Growth and Change December 2007

The growth and change continues at Global Packaging; in 2007 we have expanded our operations in every major area. We have added new personnel, we have added new equipment, we have added new customers, we have added a new warehouse facility, and we have expanded our office space. This activity is great; it is tangible evidence of ownership's ongoing investment in a company that continues to increase its impact on the flexible packaging marketplace.

During the past year we have started new relationships and expanded existing relationships with brand name manufacturers operating on a regional and a national level. Our success with these customers has the potential to move our company forward at a pace much greater than our current rate. This presents an exciting opportunity and an exciting challenge. Meeting the challenge will require that we think about our manufacturing processes with greater levels of sophistication. We need to constantly look to become better at what we do, and to find ways to become a bigger and better part of our current and our future customers' packaging supply chains.

Improvement ideas come in many ways and they begin to flow when there is a level of care and commitment that has everyone thinking about the manufacturing process and actively participating in its improvement.

The most effective way to improve the process is at the point of execution. The best ideas come from the people doing the work. Ideas often start with simple, small and subtle changes to existing procedures and practices. Ideas become improvements when they are discussed, refined and incorporated into the work flow. This process of moving an idea to an improvement does not happen automatically and it certainly doesn't happen by itself. We need every employee to actively participate in the process of improving our manufacturing work flow. Managers have to solicit ideas and create an environment that encourages change. Employees have to think about what we do and how to do it better. Active process improvement is evidence of employees' investment in a company that continues to strengthen and prepare itself for a long, bright future.

Growth is an exciting thing to witness. It is even more exciting to participate in. Don't just witness our growth, help continue it by becoming an active participant in the process of change and improvement.
